BOOK REVIEW
The Japanese in Hawaii, 1868–1967: A Bibliography of the First Hundred Years, reviewed by Shunzo Sakamaki 153

ABBREVIATIONS for frequently-cited Hawaiian sources are listed inside the back cover. These abbreviations are used throughout this journal; authors submitting manuscripts are requested to employ them.
This old daguerreotype, taken from Kawaiahao Church, shows many prominent features of early Honolulu. In the distance we see (1) the first Kaumakapili Church, built by the Rev. Lowell Smith in 1838–1839 and demolished in 1881; (2) the steeple of the Fort Street Church, built in 1856; (3) Our Lady of Peace Cathedral, R.C., built in 1840–1843, and still standing; (4) the first Royal Mausoleum, built in 1825 and demolished after 1865, when its contents were removed to the present mausoleum on Nuuamn Avenue.

Also in evidence in the foreground are coral-block houses, coral or adobe fences, and a grass hut of the type that once formed the principal architectural theme of Honolulu. In the immediate foreground is the intersection of King and Punchbowl Streets.
