CHAPTER XIV

For several minutes Janet lay on the floor in the darkness. It seemed to her that the door to the hall opened and shut again, but the impression was vague and dreamlike.

When she came to herself sufficiently to sit up, the room was still without light. She could make out the outlines of the chairs and of the table near which she had been sitting, but the rest was indistinguishable.

Looking about her room, she found it exactly as she had left it, but the sense of being watched gave her a feeling of uneasiness.

As she turned to go to the medicine chest, there was a sudden noise of a door shutting, and Janet's heart leaped. Of course, it was only Mac. The sound of footsteps in the corridor gave her the shivers.

Janet's eyes narrowed. "Are you keeping your distance?"

"I was looking for you," said Janet, as she turned around. "I thought you were coming to see me."

"What are you doing here?"

"I was afraid you were coming to see me."

"Perhaps I'll do that in the morning."

"By the way, I was wondering if you could give me some money."

"Well, I'm not in a position to give you anything."

"I was afraid you would say that."

NEW YORK (U.P.)—Notes from the major league dis­ cuits:

The biggest man in baseball (from the hay-scales point of view—265 pounds), Walter Brown, New York Giants hillman, sent off his start in the majors last year with an adequately developed home run. Mr. Walter was given the largest melon ever grown. It weighed over a ton and was
