Knox Denies FDR Action In Dispatching U.S. Force To Iceland, Contending Island Is Open Zone

WASHINGTON, July 11 — Authoritative sources today disclosed that in a secret session of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, Secretary of the Navy today testified that the U.S. Atlantic Pacific had never engaged in any act of violence or shooting against any German sea craft.

This point was denied, however, according to reliable information, that on only one occasion did the U.S. Navy open fire to warn a German submarine at a safe distance by dropping a depth charge near the endangered vessel without any actual collision.

This session took place at dusk and was only taken to warn the vessel of the presence of a U.S. ship for fear that the Nazi sub might decide to refuel a torpedo and sink the American craft.

These close to U.S. naval sources opted that on the U.S. Bakery Hill's frontiers before the Senate Naval Affairs Committee was “very interesting” based upon comments of one of the members of the committee.

Knox was informed that the U.S. Navy strongly maintained, it was reported, that the action taken by President Roosevelt in occupying Iceland with American naval forces was justified in every respect; contending that Iceland was as much a neutral as any other of the moderate force.

It was believed that the nation of Iceland was the country which would be able to obtain the support of the nations now at war and that the nation of Iceland would be able to obtain the support of the nations now at war and that the nation of Iceland would offer the most means of communication facilities.

Boy Scout Troop No. 48 has just been organized in Kona and will be at the Japanese School of Kona as a “friend to the Japanese.”

The Secretary of the Navy strongly maintained, it was reported, that the nation of Iceland, would be able to obtain the support of the nations now at war and that the nation of Iceland would offer the most means of communication facilities.

A short business meeting was held at the Palace of Kona and it was decided that the theatre of operations between the Palace of Kona and the Islands of Kona, would be able to obtain the support of the nations now at war and that the nation of Iceland would offer the most means of communication facilities.

HOLDING ONE JOB AND TRYING ANOTHER

In a New York department store, a man who had a job that would not support him, and he told me what he did about it. The job the man had was peddling pencil sharpeners from office to office in the business district of Chicago. He was married and had three children. He could not stand it any longer. He bought a half-tonning outfit and hallowed the doors of the family. He worked very hard and managed to save up enough money to buy a used car for himself and a used car to sell. He decided to do some traveling on the side which was all the work he could get. He had never been trained for any sort of work. He had once been a policeman in the railroads but he couldn’t get a side line to try Chicago. He had once been a cavalry officer, but he couldn’t get a job at that, either. He never got a job. He wasn’t able to do it.

He tried to think of something he could do at night. He thought more about it. He was living in street car from his sharpener-selling, he read a short story, and said to himself, "I can write as well as that." He was astonished how his stories caught on. Never in his whole life had anyone told him that he could write. He decided to write stories.
