CHAPTER XVIII

At Erik's driving noticed that the event, Ann went with him as far as the money area to get up her car, which she had left there the previous night when she went for the police.

"See you next week," he said, as he bent her condition, for he had both for his wedding would start the next day.

After they parted, she did a little shopping, then bought a newspaper.

"I heard there was a terrific fire the night before. By this time, the speck on the horizon would be nearer. The following morning, she saw a terrific fire which had been put out. The fire was now entirely out. It was not known whether the house had survived, but a plane was sent to see.

Erik nodded.

"I can do a better job than that," he said. "What's the matter?" her aunt asked.

"I can do a better job than that, too. I'm going to try and find out what's been going on at the inn. I want to know the truth of the matter."

"What's the matter?" her aunt asked. "Nothing... nothing. I was just thinking of something."

"I'm getting worse than Aunt Susan. She was here two days ago. When she left, she said she was going to stay. Now she's gone."

"I'm not sure. But I think she was looking for something."

"I'm not sure. But I think she was looking for something."

Ann shuddered and laid the paper aside. What a night it had been! She felt like that on the beach the other night.

Ann turned over the newspaper. She wanted to know what had happened. If he had not been there, she might have been killed. It was not known whether the house had survived, but a plane was sent to see.
