TRAVELER, HO!

Hunts Pond

On the day, Ann felt nothing but the thrill of money in her pocket. The world seemed too much ado, she turned to meet Jerry. The eyes of the people she passed. She knew money was what she had. She walked on, as she had promised herself she would: she would go through the cane fields, past the farms, past the villages, until she reached the sea. She would walk the coast, she would wander alone, she would think, she would dream.

Her mind was made up, she had made up her mind. She would not look back. She would not pause. She would not think of the past. She would not think of the future. She would only walk.

As she walked, she thought of Jerry. He was a good man. He was a kind man.

She had loved him. She had trusted him.

She had depended on him. She had been happy with him. She had been happy with her life. She had been happy with the world.

But now she was alone. She was alone. She was free. She was free.

She slipped back into the inn, saying she was going for a walk.

As she walked, she thought of Jerry. She thought of the future.

She thought of the past.

She thought of love.

And then she thought of Ann.
