At the request of the government, the coming two weeks will not only determine success or failure of the campaign to save the Philippines, but also the future course of events in Asia. The government, which has already launched a major drive to aid the Philippines, is now focusing on providing additional funding and military assistance.

The steps were accompanied by a statement from Washington that, in order to save the Philippines, a "new" war tax had to be imposed. This implied a change in country's policy on the issue of war reparations, which would be a significant step towards a more generous policy towards the Philippines.

The tax relief for the Philippines was announced in a press release, which stated that the US would provide $100 million to help revitalize the Philippines' economy. The tax relief would cover a portion of the Philippines' reparations payments to the US.

The tax relief was expected to make a significant impact on the Philippines' economy, which is struggling to recover from the effects of the war. The government is hopeful that the tax relief will help the Philippines to become a self-sustaining economy.

The Philippine government has already expressed its gratitude to the US for the tax relief. The country's leaders have been working to ensure that the tax relief is used effectively to help the Philippines.
