had axys pleases us just a little to know be women we allimite so much on the street, and it comes with a shock of pleasant surprise when we discover that actresses are or careless or dowly at home.

Postty Annie Pixley at home is the neatest and those tasteful of women, and her shapely lambs are always birsy with some lat of sawing. The other day I was into see her and noticed the quiet elegance of her away. It was a plain, seven goved skirt of mouse-colored corduroy, with buttons set along the right side over the pocket place. There was an Eton jacket, with pointed fronts and modest revers, opening over a vest of pale blue surah. There were a wrinkled belt of corduroy and moderate gigos sleeves. This was a quiet gown, but one remarkable for its neatness and elegance. Her splendid jet black hair was gathered up in a knot on the top of her head.

A few Sundays ago the newly discovered beauty, Miss Caroline Miskel, wore at a quiet dinner at home a velutina gown of pale illac shotted with gold, which showed quiet dinner at home a velutina gown of pale lilae shotted with gold, which showed only in faint gleams. The waist was draped srighly in Marie Antoinette style. The sleeves were double puffs of velvet. Across the bust was a piece of lace outlined with gold thrend. The skirt was plain, except for a double ruffle of the velvet, which sur-rounded the skirt and reached up to the knees on the right side, where it was fas-tened under a how. Another was set on the bottom.

Her rich, red gold hair was gathered oosely in front and back and all brought up to the top of her head in a quaint high knot. This is a style that is fast coming into favor and is very becoming to some and a very ugly one indeed to others. Of an atternoon Miss Miskel wears a delicate and dainty apple green crepon, lavishly trimmed with white lace and green ribbeins, a shade or so paler than the exepon. This is also swathed around the waist like the pretty gray gown she wears on the stage as Huck, the minister's daughter.

Lillian Russell generally dresses very plainly on the street, but there are times when she goes along with a gown fit for an empress. I saw her walking along Fifth when sing cost along with a gown in for an empress. I saw her walking along Fifth arenne only the other day in a superb groen velutina gown. The green was just that soft shade of olive that harmonizes so well with a fair complexion, and it was undershot with salmon pink. The pile of the velutina was so heavy that it was but rarely that the pink showed up through its folds, but when it did the effect was exquisitely pleasing. The skirt had three ruffles of the velvet, one, a little wider than the other two, at the bottom, the other two set higher up on the skirt. There was a long military cape of the same, lined with salmon pink sitin, There were one deep "sprung" cape and one gathered stole cape, both bordered with real sable. A small had of green felt with two quills of deep red completed this very elegant costume.

In her home Lillian Russell wears loose, graceful gowns with quantities of lace and ribbons, and they are always in the most ribbons, and they are always in the most delicate and arising timts rather than col-ors. Artistic everything is around her, and she is no mean artist herself. There are no slippers down at the heels, no untidy govern nor carelessness of any kind mong any of the actresses that I know. Pretty flower faced Annie Russell is an other model in the way of home attire. She has been long an invalid, but now the pubas she is soon to begin to play again. The other day she presented her loyely self, without an instant's waiting, in a light cloth gown with a straight ned with three parrow rows of fur, each headed by two soutache braids in bronze silk. The weist was round and had a belt formed of three lines of gold braid. There was a figaro bound with fur and elaborately braided with bronze gold metal mtache. There was a ripple collar to this message come for me the other day rom a prominent importer, saying that there was something new for me to see what do you suppose it was? Why, about a million dollars' worth of shawls, and were not so very many of them. They cost all the way from $500 to $1,500 apiece. They are India shawls and cost at the rate of $100 a pound or more. They are the same us those worn by our great-great-grandmorkers, and theirs before them, for the fusion never changes in India shawis. They are worn or not, just as caprice seizes the fair women, but an as caprice seizes the fair women, but an lodia shawl is always a magnificent thing richer and more valuable than any fur except perhaps sable and real black fox some of these have black centers, some so these have black centers, some white, some red, and the patterns labori-

There was shown in a line of these in every color, but the most elegant was the binck, which showed up beautifully in the crape effect, some of the shadows formed by the crapes booking al-most like burnished steel. The two toned velvets and velutions will be seen everywhere, the new ribbed two toned effects be ing scarcely as popular as that with a plain surface through which the underlying color shows as it folds and moves. The cheep qualities, with out ton buck, soon crease and grow shabby, but the velatina does not, and no s it is ranked as among the best goods of that class.
