Provost O’Connor, Dr. Odo, Distinguished Guests and Friends:

For a century and a half, the Smithsonian Institution has been a place of wonder.
The Smithsonian receives more than 29 million visitors annually and is a place where Americans are reminded of how much our nation has in common.
It is the principal repository of our nation's collective memory and the nation’s largest public cultural space.

The Smithsonian is dedicated to preserving, understanding and displaying collections that portray the diversity and depth of American civilization.
Through its 140 million artifacts, 16 museums and galleries, and the National Zoo, the Smithsonian safeguards our collective history and symbolizes the ideals to which we aspire as a polity.
Three years ago, I was asked to serve on the Smithsonian Asian Pacific American National Advisory Group. Over the course of two years, the Group deliberated on the Smithsonian’s regard for the rich diversity of our Asian Pacific communities.
Our research revealed that a record of the historical and contemporary significance of our presence in the United States is largely absent from the Smithsonian’s collections, research, exhibitions, and current planning.
The establishment of the Asian Pacific American Studies Program in 1998 under the Office of Provost O’Connor was an important step toward addressing these gaps.
The Program will facilitate the incorporation of Asian Pacific heritages into our national cultural legacy through collections, research, exhibitions, educational outreach, and technology networking.
The program will provide a better understanding of our rich heritages through the creation of future Asian Pacific American exhibitions and other activities at the Smithsonian, and help to dispel any Asian Pacific American stereotypes and prejudices.

It gives me great pleasure to introduce to you Dr. Franklin Odo. Among his many accomplishments, Dr. Odo was former Chairperson and Professor of the Ethnic Studies Department of the University of Hawaii, and currently is Counselor to Provost O’Connor.
He is the champion and leader of the Asian Pacific American Program at the Smithsonian. Please welcome Dr. Odo.
REMARKS BY SENATOR DANIEL K. INOUYE
Informational Briefing at the Smithsonian Institution
Saturday, May 22, 1999
Provost O'Connor, Dr. Odo, Distinguished Guests and Friends: For a century and a half, the Smithsonian Institution has been a place of wonder. The Smithsonian receives more than 29 million visitors annually and is a place where Americans are reminded of how much our nation has in common. It is the principal repository of our nation's collective memory and the nation's largest public cultural space.

The Smithsonian is dedicated to preserving, understanding and displaying collections that portray the diversity and depth of American civilization. Through its 140 million artifacts, 16 museums and galleries, and the National Zoo, the Smithsonian safeguards our collective history and symbolizes the ideals to which we aspire as a polity.

Three years ago, I was asked to serve on the Smithsonian Asian Pacific American National Advisory Group. Over the course of two years, the Group deliberated on the Smithsonian’s regard for the rich diversity of our Asian Pacific communities. Our research revealed that a record of the historical and contemporary significance of our presence in the United States is largely absent from the Smithsonian’s collections, research, exhibitions, and current planning.

The establishment of the Asian Pacific American Studies Program in 1998 under the Office of Provost O’Connor was an important step toward addressing these gaps. The Program will facilitate the incorporation of Asian Pacific heritages into our national cultural legacy through collections, research, exhibitions, educational outreach, and technology networking. The program will provide a better understanding of our rich heritages through the creation of future Asian Pacific American exhibitions and other
REMARKS BY SENATOR DANIEL K. INOUYE
Informational Briefing at the Smithsonian Institution
Saturday, May 22, 1999
Provost O’Connor, Dr. Odo, Distinguished Guests and Friends: For a century and a half, the Smithsonian Institution has been a place of wonder. The Smithsonian receives more than 29 million visitors annually and is a place where Americans are reminded of how much our nation has in common. It is the principal repository of our nation’s collective memory and the nation’s largest public cultural space.

The Smithsonian is dedicated to preserving, understanding and displaying collections that portray the diversity and depth of American civilization. Through its 140 million artifacts, 16 museums and galleries, and the National Zoo, the Smithsonian safeguards our collective history and symbolizes the ideals to which we aspire as a polity.

Three years ago, I was asked to serve on the Smithsonian Asian Pacific American National Advisory Group. Over the course of two years, the Group deliberated on the Smithsonian’s regard for the rich diversity of our Asian Pacific communities. Our research revealed that a record of the historical and contemporary significance of our presence in the United States is largely absent from the Smithsonian’s collections, research, exhibitions, and current planning.

The establishment of the Asian Pacific American Studies Program in 1998 under the Office of Provost O’Connor was an important step toward addressing these gaps. The Program will facilitate the incorporation of Asian Pacific heritages into our national cultural legacy through collections, research, exhibitions, educational outreach, and technology networking. The program will provide a better understanding of our rich heritages through the creation of future Asian Pacific American exhibitions and other activities at the Smithsonian, and help to dispel any Asian Pacific American stereotypes and prejudices.

It gives me great pleasure to introduce to you Dr. Franklin Odo. Among his many accomplishments, Dr. Odo was former Chairperson and Professor of the Ethnic Studies Department of the University of Hawaii, and currently is Counselor to Provost O'Connor. He is the champion and leader of the Asian Pacific American Program at the Smithsonian. Please welcome Dr. Odo.