Hawaiian Gazette.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 21, 1888. Sugar Plantations on the Island of Oahu. HAWAII, OAHU, Dec. 24, 1887.

I left New Orleans on Thanksgiving day, November 30th, and reached here December 3rd, coming by way of the river to its mouth and then on to Cedar Keys and Key West; at each of which places I had several hours on shore. Here in Key West I found everything unlike anything I had ever seen before.

The city lies on a flat plain about a mile long. Across the bay is a splendid breakers, but it is monopolized by the fortress and no residences are allowed upon it.

It is a pity as it would make a magnificent location for suburban residences, being high and well drained, and swept by ocean breezes.

As it is the rich most herd with the poor in the city, the wealthy mansion by the side with the negro hut, and as the drainage is bad and no attention paid to cleaning the streets, the two take the fever together.

I don't wonder that the yellow fever is almost perennial here. I should think that any kind of filth disease would flourish for it has not been here for a long time.

I went last night into the country, spending two days on a plantation, or hacienda, as they call them, and two more days in the city.

I had gathered my ideas of plantation life in the tropics mainly from my Hawaiian experience and looked to find another Ulu, and on a grander scale. But I was highly mistaken. The plantation was very large, some 60,000 acres in extent, with over 7,000 in cane and as much more in wood land, and a sugar house, including machinery, that cost over $100,000. But the proprietor here was an ignorant cobbler, he could hardly have lived with less luxury, not to say comfort, at least according to the scale of the country. The house was a single story with roof and floor of tiles. The windows, like Hawaiian houses, were "French," opening upon the piazza, like doors, they were made of iron with inner shutters of heavy plank, but no glass.

A marble top table with a few papers and some books, and a chair, and a table of rough hand made frame seated and backed with hide dried with the hair on, furnished the living room, around which were hung framed lithographs and advertising pictures of machinery.

The food was cooked well according to Spanish taste, I had heard and no doubt I should have preferred something else than fresh pork and other vegetables than potatoes and onions.

There was a boiled rice called coconut that I thought might be something like Pis, as I am told they make starch of it. In growing the looks like rice, but it is not rice. The sweet potatoes are very good and healthy. Irish potatoes not so dry. Outside the house was a little garden with a few plants in soap boxes and some other things, but not much to be seen. I had everything looked sickly and dry.

Last September there were two tremendous hurricanes, that destroyed the bananae so that they are still quite scarce here in the city, and on the plantations are as yet none ripe. As for oranges, I did not see any, but indeed of any fruit, although this is the fruit garden of the world. Outside the garden fence the ground about the sugar house was broken and brown by the hoofs of horses and oxen.

The buildings were arranged as neatly as possible to the center of the cane tract and as the ground was a dead level with occasional hills, there is no view at all. Access to the railroad station was by a railroad switch track and a narrow gauge for horse use.

In all the country traveling is almost entirely by horseback, though in my trips of 200 miles I did use two mules and a pack animal with long shafts and wheels behind as solid as an ox cart. These were two horses, one in the shafts, which are fully ten feet long the other beside him attached to the shafts by long ropes. The side horse is ridden a foot behind the driver and as the carriage and horse, it makes a sort of sedan chair, or backboard spring that enables the rider to bounce over the rocks without dislocating his spine.

While at Cardenas I rode out about ten miles into the country to look at some machinery of manufacture, the most modern in the island, with a population of 25,000 to 30,000, and I do not think has been in existence for 100 years, but you would hardly find more places on the road to the volcano than we found that day.

We passed one ox wagon, the only vehicle I saw. The frame mounted on two wheels was like one of our own N. E. carts. The pole oxen were large strong animals with the yoke and traces made of rawhide, and the oxen and is lashed to the horns (just back of which it lies) only enough to prevent slipping. A broad soft cushion lies against the forehead across which there are ropes leading to the yoke. In this way the entire strain of the pull comes upon the hard bones of the upper forehead, enabling the ox to throw his whole weight against it.

Besides the pole oxen there was another yoke of smaller oxen on the lead at the end of a rope so long that they were not behind the pole, and thirty feet further ahead was another yoke of little steers hardly bigger than half-grown calves.

Before I came here I wondered why the Cubans had not given up their cane and taken to milks like the Louisiana planters, but after seeing these rocks I am not so sure. On the plantation where I first visited I found cane growing on land as rough and full of rocks as the hillsides here. The cane was managed to plough such land is a mystery to me, but they did, and with a rastra, a rastra is a sort of rastra, they will look off in spite of the rastra, inside it is full of stones, but had there been sufficient rain would have destroyed the amount.

I have spoken of the fruits. This is out of season for most of them, but there is still a good variety in the Havana markets. Oranges are scarce as compared with the Louisiana fruits, which, under the influence of a light frost, had ripened rapidly before. Here the fruit is said to be very dry and contains few green counts are piled on the floors of all the restaurants and ayus de ayus, either with or without a little sugar, are very common.
