

The Blue Geranium

by DOLAN BIRKLEY

Mrs. Nina Arkwright is found murdered at a resort hotel. Those connected with the case include Janet Cooper, hotel swimming teacher; Joel Markham, young chemist who was associated with Nina in business; Rodman Arkwright, her estranged husband; Kay Feldman, her niece; Bobbie Craine, debutante; and Jack Seyfert, young man whom Bobbie has been pursuing. The day after the murder, Janet finds Bobbie apparently looking for something in Joel's room, but doesn't question her. Captain Loring of the police believes the motive for the murder may have been $100,000 in cash which Nina recently received from Rodman. However, another angle concerns a flier, Danny McLeod, who was lost on a trans-Pacific flight she sponsored some years ago. Janet learns that, just before her death, she secretly arranged to have a place card made for Danny for a dinner she planned. Rodman, trying to find out what Janet knows about the police theories, brings up the subject of the dinner, cryptically mentions a good-luck charm Danny had carried on his disastrous flight, then abruptly leaves.

was evident that Kay feared the police investigation and had enlisted Rodman Arkwright's aid in finding out what they knew. Anger surged through Janet again as she thought of how Rodman had come to her on the pretext of apologizing to her but actually for the purpose of discovering what she knew of Loring's theories. Why was he working in Kay's behalf?

Baffled, Janet went back to her room. Slipping into the chair by the window, she gazed out at the courtyard below and at the grounds beyond.

She saw Kay and Rodman seated on a bench beneath a tree with their heads close together. Nearby, old Mac was sweeping a walk.

Then, Mr. Jepperson came into view, striding along the walk. He nodded to Kay and Rodman, then stopped to speak to Mac. In the distance, Janet saw Jack and Bobbie, going toward the badminton courts.

It occurred to her suddenly that every one involved in the case except Joel was in sight and, with this thought, came another. While all these people were out of the hotel, why not go to Bobbie's room, and see whether she could find what Bobbie had taken from Joel's room?

CHAPTER XXVII
FOR a moment, Janet sat still, dumbfounded by Rodman's abrupt departure. Then, she leaped up angrily and started after him. He must be made to explain what he meant by his reference to good-luck charms in connection with Danny McLeod's flight!

As she hurried from her room, she saw that the glazed-glass door at the end of the corridor was still swinging from his passage through it. She went to it and was about to put her hand on it, when she heard voices beyond it.

She stopped, listening. The voices were Rodman's and Kay's.

"... didn't get much out of her," she heard Rodman say.

"But you did get something, didn't you?" Kay asked tensely.

"A little. She said the police know about McLeod's name on the place card, but she didn't get the drift when I led up to the reason for the dinner. Her face looked genuinely blank. I asked her whether she knew that fliers usually carried a good-luck charm of some sort and—"

Kay broke in sharply. "You shouldn't have been so definite! Now, she'll go to Loring and start him looking for something like that!"

"Nothing definite in it," said Rodman. "What you gave McLeod had its other uses."

"Yes—that's true," Kay agreed. "Still, it was a heck of a gift to hand a man like McLeod at the start of a long flight. You might just as well have handed him a gun!"

"Hush!" Kay said quickly. "Some one might hear you! Come on—let's go outside."

There was the sound of retreating footsteps.

JANET remained where she was, pressed against the corridor wall. What did Rodman's last remark mean? You might just as well have handed him a gun. Had Kay given Danny McLeod something that had caused his death? Had she done it deliberately? It was incredible! What motive could she have had?

Had she feared that, through McLeod, she might lose the money she hoped to inherit from Nina? Had she feared that her aunt's interest in the young flier might lead to marriage, and that McLeod, unaccustomed to wealth, would go wild with his rich wife's money, spending it feverishly? Had she wanted to protect her own financial outlook? It was fantastic, but it was possible.

Could Nina, at this late date, have discovered what Kay had given McLeod, and had she set the stage for a gruesome dinner party at which she meant to expose her niece? Had Kay learned of her plan and, to prevent it, had she had her killed Nina?

Janet shuddered. Certainly, it rising quickly, she went out into the corridor and started toward the lobby. First, she thought, she must get hold of a master key, for Bobbie's door would probably be locked. She knew that Jepperson had one in his office, and knew where he kept it.

Reaching the lobby, she sauntered past the assistant manager's office, saw that it was empty, then casually turned back and entered it. It took but a few minutes to locate the key and to pocket it.

Then, leaving the office, she made for the stairs. She had soon climbed to the third floor and found her way to Bobbie's door.

As she entered the room, she experienced a moment of surprise. For a girl with the means that Bobbie was supposed to have, the room seemed very unpretentious.

She began her search by looking under things—under the rug, the bed, the dresser, and an old-fashioned wardrobe. Then, she explored the bed further, but found nothing under the mattress or the pillows.

The wardrobe, which she saw was necessary because the room had no closet, contained an assortment of clothing, all of which she had seen Bobbie wear at one time or another. Though it was good, there was a smaller amount of it than Janet had expected.

She found herself wondering whether Bobbie was actually as rich as she was supposed to be. It would be amusing if she had been baiting Jack with wealth that didn't exist. It would be still funnier if she were after Jack because she thought that he had money. The ironic thought of two fortune hunters deluding each other brought a half smile to Janet's lips.

As there seemed to be nothing at all suspicious in the wardrobe, she was about to turn away from it, when it occurred to her to search the top of it. It was high but, by standing on tiptoe, she could feel along the top with her hand.

At first, her fingers encountered only smooth wood under a coating of dust. Then, they came in contact with something cool and slick. Pulling the object to the edge, she saw that it was a patent-leather bag.

Why should it be on top of the wardrobe? Taking it down, she saw that it was bulging.

As she began fumbling with the catch, it suddenly flew open, spilling a huge wad of paper money onto the floor. Janet stared down at the scattered greenbacks, then stooped and pawed through them. They were all of large denominations—dozens upon dozens of $100 bills, some $500 bills, and even some of $1000!

She caught her breath. The money that Rodman Arkwright had given Nina! This must be it!

At that instant, a sharp knock sounded on the door.
