Eating Poi.

We extract the following from "The Vagabond's" letter to the Melbourne Argus. Some of our readers will recollect "The Vagabond," who was a fellow passenger of His Majesty between here and San Francisco:

"At lunch we eat the last of the poi which Mr. Dean had kindly sent me at Honolulu, and which had been kept fresh in the ice-chest. I like this Hawaiian national dish when it is in good condition. I am assured that it is a very healthy article of diet. The natives live and thrive on it, but the true poi-eater likes it "high," when the process of decay has succeeded that of fermentation, and when the untrained nostrils are offended at the odour. But your gourmand of game in Great Britain possesses exactly the same taste.
Putrid flesh is savoury to him, as putrid vegetable extract is to the Hawaiian. It is one of the ambitions of my life to eat poi like a true native—to sit around a calabash, to dip my two first fingers into the gruelly gelatinous looking substance, to twirl them round as one does a spoon in the molasses pitcher, and then adroitly hoist and transfer a streamy portion of poi into my mouth. That is the real way to eat it. That is the way I once tried to do it. The result—the stuff went into my eyes, nose, ears, down my neck, everywhere except into the proper receptacle. I eat poi with a silver spoon now, but still nourish the thought that some day I may achieve my wish."

Hugged.

Old Eph Sewell, who as a snake-charmer used to be one of the attractions of Barnum's museum, related to a New York reporter the incidents of a famous fight he once had with a boa constrictor. Eph had charge of a cage of reptiles, and used to go into the cage and lie down with the snakes. He said:—

"On one occasion I introduced myself to the largest boa constrictor ever brought to this country. He was eighteen feet in length, and weighed over three hundred pounds.
He had been in the country two weeks, and Barnum was obliged to pay a good price for him. When I went into the cage I saw that he had become monarch of the concern.
The remaining snakes were as submissive as mice, and when they crawled over to meet me his lordship looked wicked. I caught him in my arms, and he reared his head until it rested upon my left shoulder.
Lifting him as much as possible, I passed him around my body, and he apparently imagined that he was embracing a tree in his native jungle. He tightened his coil, and a feeling like I was being slowly suffocated came over me. Quicker than a flash I caught him back of his head, and by a desperate effort wrenched myself free. Then we both got angry. The boa came towards me, and I caught him by the throat. I was strong enough to hold him at arm's length despite his struggles, and in a few moments he gave up the fight and relaxed his coils. Then I shook him until he was thoroughly alarmed, and ever afterward he was submissive. Had I permitted his coils to close about me, no earthly agency could have saved me."

A NEW GAS LIGHT.—In the presence of the reporters and two medical gentlemen, Mr. Bennie, of Maori Hill, Dunedin, gave an exhibition of the light capabilities of his new gas, for which he has now taken out patents in Australia and New Zealand, and has sold the former. The gas is manufactured out of air, water, and ordinary beef, or mutton fat. He has had it burning in his private house for 12 months. The light is pure, clear, and white, and more powerful than that of the Dunedin gas. It has no smell. The cost is very small, running from 1s 3d to 2s per thousand feet.

Arabi Pasha fled from Alexandria in a boat by the canal, but it is not known whether his troops are dispersing. One report says he has only 4000 very much discouraged troops.
