THE LATE NEWS.

Ernesto Garriga - The late news has been received from Honolulu...

JACK AND DOLLY.

The air is soft and warm, like spring, and the southern wind and the cloudy sky proclaim a hazy morning. It is breakfast time at Hollyhock, and the master is in his room standing on the porch. Breakfast comes soon enough, and with it the post-boy, and a minute later his wife.

Kind-hearted, generous Jack! he would be guilty of cruelty to man, woman or child for the world; yet the last few weeks of terror, during which he, his wife, and his children have been threatened! Hollyhock is a desert. Such few cattle as were not mangled have been sold. Captain Trevor is under no pretence of fear, and for what? He asks the question often enough in his own heart, straightforward way, and no one seems able to answer it. His mind is set on the letting value; his tenants have a fair, just, honorable demand to deal with; but any day, any hour, he may be shot! His corn and hay were burnt to cinders long ago, and ruin menaces him!

A very dreary morning. Mrs. Trevor watches the children, but for their walk, and a lamp comes to her, and she sees the little procession going down the avenue in the soft, gray light of the winter noon: baby Dorothy in her perambulator, little Cecil walking by the nurse, and two policemen, armed with loaded guns, keep a close look-out on either side. If it were not so real, so terrible, Dolly could almost laugh to see the perambulator with the two great policemen in attendance. However it is no laughing matter—only a wise precaution. Outside on the terrace the drawing-room windows another policeman marches up and down. It seems incredible that this should be necessary in the year Eighteen hundred and Eighty-one, but so it is, and Dolly is getting accustomed to be guarded and watched. She goes out, too, and walks about with the children, protected by their escort. They see nothing, hear nothing unusual. It is a soft, lively day, with a gray sky and a haze of spring in the air; but Dolly can take no pleasure in anything till her husband is safe. She gathers a bunch of violets and comes in again, with that vague consciousness that has made her so restless of late whenever Jack is out of her sight.

The newspapers are full of agrarian outrages, land enclosures and disturbing notices. Dolly glances over them, but the subjects are not cheerful, so she puts them aside, and sits down to write a letter to an old school-girl friend in England. After beating about the bush for some time, Dolly scribbles out the following: "I dare say in England you have not the faintest idea of the actual state we are in here, actually living in terror of our lives. Jack is not coming home, the first time that he has not returned with the police for three weeks. I did not like his going at all, and shall not be happy until he is home again. Poor fellow! he feels it dreadfully, being almost a prisoner, or driving out with an armed guard. Fancy the children having police armed all about them to protect them when they are out even in the place. It makes me very miserable, and the wretched government will do nothing. That dreadful Land League held a meeting here last Sunday, and we expect that something terrible will follow. I am trying to persuade Jack to leave the country, but he says he would be frightened away, and in the meantime there is nothing but run before us. We have got no rents, and I see no prospect of getting any, but I do not care for that; I only mind the awful fear that is perpetually before me: that they will do something to Jack. I believe it is a regular system, and they have hired and paid assassins. It is not terrible to think of if I hardly ever let Jack go out without me, and I cannot tell you how wretched I feel to-day, knowing that he is in danger; and how long is this dreadful state of affairs to last, how many more widows must be made before it is put a stop to? ..."
