

Chronological: Subcommittee on VA-HUD re. FEMA, 1993-01-27

Senator Daniel K. Inouye Papers
Speeches, Box SP10, Folder 17
<http://hdl.handle.net/10524/63499>

Items in eVols are protected by copyright, with all rights reserved, unless otherwise indicated.

UHM Library Digital Collections Disclaimer and Copyright Information

STATEMENT BY

SENATOR DANIEL K. INOUE

January 27, 1993

Federal Emergency Management Agency

Madame Chair and Members of the Subcommittee:

Thank you for the opportunity to participate in this timely hearing on the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA),

and the changes needed to improve FEMA's response to catastrophic disasters.

The recent disasters in Florida, Louisiana, California, and Hawaii have drawn various opinions on the effectiveness of FEMA, and its role in providing disaster relief assistance.

In the case of Hawaii, extraordinary efforts were made by all concerned federal agencies to cut through the "red tape" and minimize bureaucratic requirements in their work at speeding disaster relief assistance and services to the citizens and state and county governments affected by Hurricane Iniki. I realize that this was not the case for Florida and Louisiana.

One critical problem facing State of Hawaii as a result of Hurricane Iniki is the availability of homeowner's insurance.

Hurricane Iniki has caused the insolvency of one of the state's largest domestic insurance companies;
at least six others have indicated
they will not renew policies
beginning in February.

This represents a substantial portion of the Hawaiian market and the repercussions to the local economy are already evident.

I am told by the State Insurance Commissioner that it is nearly impossible to obtain a new homeowner's insurance policy in Hawaii at this time. The problem in Hawaii is the same problem that confronts Florida. As bad as Hurricanes Iniki and Andrew were, they could have been much, much worse. Had Iniki hit Honolulu or Andrew struck closer to Miami, the death and destruction could have been five times as great.

States cannot shoulder this burden alone. Local governments cannot shoulder this burden alone.

Insurance companies cannot shoulder
this burden alone.

In the last Congress, I proposed legislation dealing with the problem of catastrophic insurance coverage for earthquakes and volcanos.

In the wake of Hurricane Iniki, it has become clear that the same dangers I warned against for those perils are equally relevant to hurricanes.

Therefore, in the weeks ahead, I plan to reintroduce my legislation, with modifications. The new legislation would create a federal reinsurance program against catastrophic hurricanes, earthquakes and volcanoes, and would require effective mitigation programs in relevant areas so that when disasters do occur, death, injuries, and damage to property are kept to an absolute minimum.